Overview

Bearings are the devices that connect the moving parts of a tracker – including the modules – with the stationary posts or piles. The lower part of the bearing is attached to a galvanized steel post, and the upper part moves along with the “table” – the modules and the structure which holds them – as the table is driven.

The bearing allows the tracker’s table to move smoothly and with minimal friction. The bearing also defines the motion – exactly how the table moves – typically in a semicircular arc, from.

Leading tracker suppliers now design their products to work for up to 35 years, with little or no maintenance. So, it is critical that bearings work well.

A bearing’s design establishes both 1) the axis of rotation, which may be “real” like the axle of a wheel or “virtual,” and 2) the center of mass of the moving table – the horizontal line at the.
